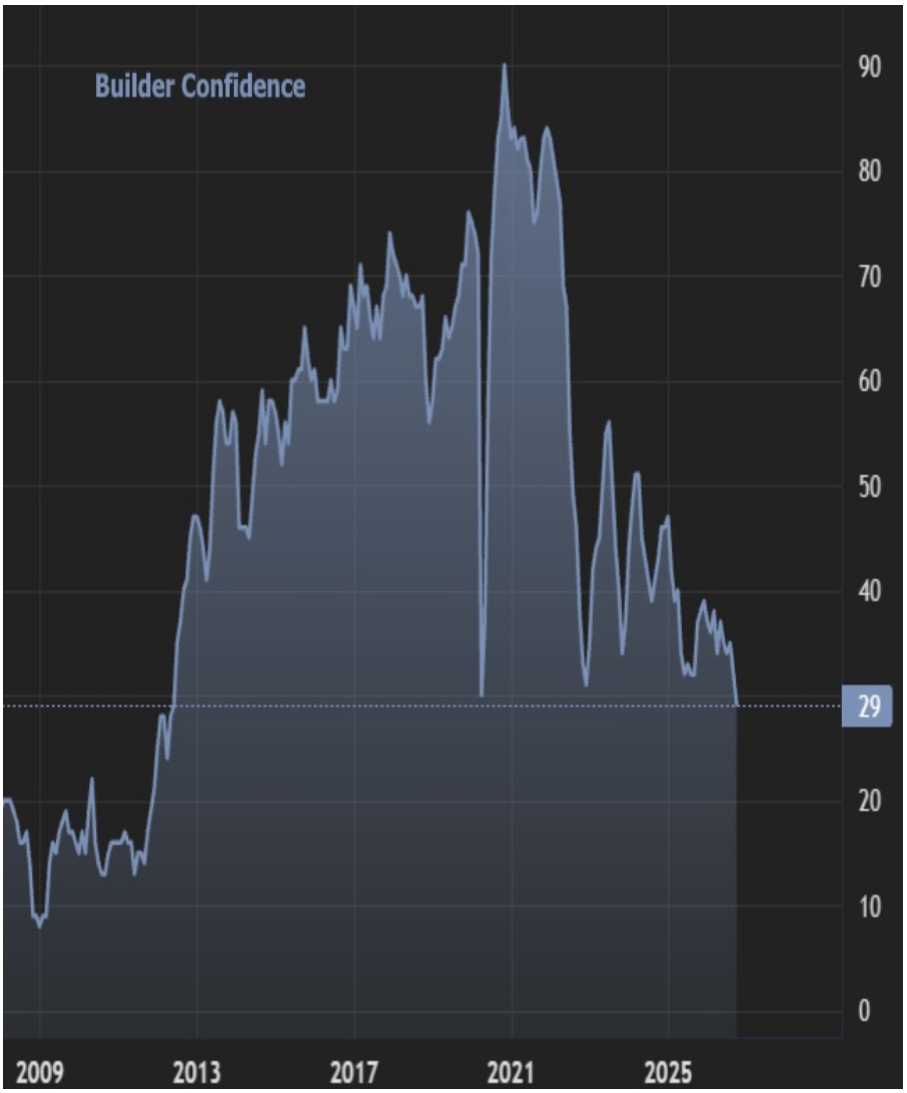
Builder Confidence Hits Lowest Level Since 2012

The National Association of Home Builders (NAHB)/Wells Fargo Housing Market Index (HMI) dropped three points to 29 in October--its lowest level in 14 years. As per usual, higher mortgage rates, rising costs, and worsening labor and lot conditions were the driving factors.



All three component indices declined, with prospective buyer traffic suffering the steepest drop.

HMI Component	September	October	Change
Current sales conditions	35	33	-2
Sales expectations	37	32	-5
Prospective buyer traffic	23	18	-5

"Buyer traffic has now fallen to its lowest level since April 2012, excluding the initial pandemic shock in April 2020." said NAHB Chairman Bill Owens. Builders are also facing higher construction loan, material and diesel costs, along with construction delays tied to immigration enforcement activity.
