Bonds Rattled By Surprisingly Big Beat in Spending Data

MBS Recap Matthew Graham | 4:01 PM

Today's big surprise was the PCE price index component of Q1 GDP. GDP itself was weaker than expected, but even that was explained away by components not related to private domestic consumption. Focusing on the latter makes Q1 look just as strong as any of the past few quarters. PCE did the most damage for two reasons. It was MUCH higher than expected (3.7 vs 3.4) and that implies tomorrow's PCE data (a monthly version of today's quarterly report) is also at risk of coming in higher than expected. This "sneak peek" effect is only a concern once per quarter with the "advance" release of GDP.

Lock / Float Considerations

Thursday's DCE surprise means that risk /roward are suddenly elevated heading into Eriday. Markets are © MBS Live, LLC. All rights reserved. It's impossible to know exactly where the new consensus is, but it's a given that the potential for big movement in either direction is much higher than it was yesterday.
