The Sun Also Sets on Bond Rallies

MBS Recap Matthew Graham | 4:44 PM

Don't worry, the headline is much more dire than the underlying message. Long story short, there are always some counter-trend influences even when the bond market is trending decisively in one direction. One might refer to the trend since May or to last week's CPI reaction as decisive. As such, one might increasingly expect some ground to be given. We could certainly argue that we've seen resistance in bonds ever since the middle of Thursday morning, following the CPI rally. In a figurative sense, this re-sets the board for the next move, and big ticket economic data helps determine the direction of that move.

Lock / Float Considerations

Last week's CPI helped solidify the on-again, off-again downtrend in rates that began in May. The burden of proof is increasingly on bond bears and upbeat econ data. That is welcome news for risk-tolerant clients, but it's good to remember that there are always pockets of correction in any trend. The more we push long term lows, the more such risks make sense to consider. Beyond that, "data dependency" reigns supreme. In the shortest term, Tuesday's Retail Sales is likely the biggest risk of the week on the data front.
