PPI Drives Decent Rally; But CPI Packs a Bigger Punch

MBS Recap | Matthew Graham | 4:39 PM

This morning's core m/m Producer Price Index hit 0.0% versus a median forecast of 0.2%. Unsurprisingly, the friendly inflation reading resulted in immediate but reasonably subdued gains for the bond market. It goes without saying that PPI will always be 2nd fiddle to CPI (the Consumer Price Index). With CPI looming tomorrow morning, it's no surprise to see bonds avoid getting too carried away trading today's data. The reaction would likely be quite a bit more aggressive if we see a similarly big drop/miss in tomorrow's CPI data.

Lock / Float Considerations

- Highest risk/reward of the week ahead of Wednesday's CPI data. This is one of the 3 big reports that will solidify the case for a Fed rate cut in September (the other two being the next CPI and the early September jobs report). If all 3 are cooler than expected, they also serve the role of suggesting a 50bp Fed rate cut. Conversely, if all 3 are much higher than expected, they could knock the 100% probability of a cut down to a 50/50 or worse. With all of the above in mind, volatility risk is exceptionally high even though marquis reports can also thread the needle and ultimately leave the market roughly sideways.
