Bonds Turn Green Despite Plenty of Volatility

MBS Recap | Matthew Graham | 4:52 PM

It was touch and go in the mid-day hours as early stability (modest gains, even) gave way to steady selling. Headlines from Fed's Bostic (he's not sure they'll need to cut again in Nov) caused yields to pop to the highs of the day just before the 30yr bond auction. After a decent auction, bonds calmed right down and slowly inched back into positive territory. That's a pretty decent result considering the 0.3 vs 0.3 core CPI reading this morning and the higher jobless claims number being subject to weather-related doubts.

Lock / Float Considerations

- Bonds continuing to drift in a choppy range that's been mostly weaker this week, but that is hopefully leveling off in general. Amid such trends, there will be examples of gains and losses, but it will take a sustained improvement to say the post-NFP bond market correction is truly over. Floating is akin to catching a falling knife until the market proves it's done with this correction. That will take weak econ data and the data has to be in a significant report.
