Fairly Big Sell-Off, But Last Week's Range is Intact

MBS Recap | Matthew Graham | 5:27 PM

Bonds dealt with a trifecta of unfriendly economic data today with slightly stronger Retail Sales leading the charge. Jobless claims and Philly Fed certainly didn't help. In the desert of data that exists between each month's jobs reports, only a handful of days stand out as potential sources of course correction. Today was one of them and the 8bp sell-off in 10yr yields confirms it. Despite that reasonably big jump, yields are still under last week's highs. That's a decent consolation prize--one that suggests the market will remain willing to rally if it sees cracks in the next round of relevant data.

Lock / Float Considerations

- Thursday's data delivered on the high risk front with a big move in the bond market, but not as much on the reward front. Specifically, rate sheets didn't move nearly as much as the market suggested. That makes for a very compelling lock opportunity--especially for the risk averse crowd who didn't happen to lock yesterday. It continues to be the case that the biggest moves are a risk after the biggest econ data and that the first two weeks of November could be extraordinarily volatile.
