2nd Straight Day of Losses. Blame Data or Stocks?

MBS Recap | Matthew Graham | 3:45 PM

We already saw the end of the bond market's 9 day winning streak with yesterday's big mid-day reversal. Today makes it extra official with modestly weaker close. That may not have been our destiny. In fact, at 9:59AM ET, it looked like yields were happy to push back toward Tuesday's lows, but things changed after the 10am ISM data. While it's clear that ISM sent yields quickly higher, the rest of the day's trading is a matter of debate or perspective. The key question is whether bonds would have lost as much ground as they did had it not been for a stock market recovery. Probably not, but the additional weakness attributable to stocks/sentiment was fairly small. Bottom line: for now, data still deserves more of the blame.

Lock / Float Considerations

- On occasions where bonds experience a correction after an extended rally, we often see that correction last for 2 days. If we could see nothing else beyond the charts, Wednesday looked like that kind of day. With the benefit of underlying news and data, there's a bit more of a reason to be cautious. Tariff developments afford equities a chance to stop the bleeding and ISM Services data suggests not all econ data will be rate-friendly. Either way, volatility risks are increasing here, not only because momentum is shifting, but also due to the bigger potential reaction to Friday's jobs report.
