Data Dependence is Back, But Not in A Fun Way

MBS Recap Matthew Graham | 4:17 PM

Bonds definitely paused their long term relationship with economic data in wake of the tariff announcement in early April, which was logical given the headline-drive volatility and uncertainty. 2 weeks ago, the connection looked to be returning. Now over the past 2 days, it's back with a vengeance. It's not that any of the data has been stunningly strong, but it's been much better than what some market participants were prepared to see. Friday's jobs report is the 2nd time in 2 days where traders have been able (or forced?) to reconcile their more dire fears with a less dire reality. Translation: higher stocks, higher yields. More big ticket data on the way on Monday...

Lock / Float Considerations

Friday's jobs report reiterated the bond market's re-connection to big ticket economic data, even if the example was an unpleasant one. The recent range suggests there's room to move in either direction depending on data, and Monday brings another big ticket report. Translation, risks remain higher than normal with respect to floating.
