Perfectly Logical Reaction to On-Target Data

MBS Recap | Matthew Graham | 5:02 PM

It's not necessarily a fun fact to face, but today's bond market sell-off was a perfectly logical reaction to the modest beat in NFP. But wait, what about the negative revisions?! Yes, it's still a logical reaction. Reasons for this are exhaustively discussed in today's video, but the short version is as follows. Wednesday's rally was largely about Wednesday's data carrying anecdotal implications for Friday's jobs report. When Friday's jobs report didn't deliver the goods, the rally was erased. Revisions didn't matter because last month's NFP was a big beat in and of itself and only revised to levels that were still higher than today's headline. Bottom line: NFP looks sideways at decent levels--not at all worthy of the concern suggested by Wednesday's reports and other generally weaker data over the past week.

Lock / Float Considerations

- Friday's jobs report reset the board to some extent when it comes to short term lock/float considerations. There was asymmetric risk up until then, and more balanced risk moving forward. The upcoming data is not as meaty, so we could see more of a willingness to react to fiscal headlines.
