As has been and continues to be the case, zooming out on the same chart results in an entirely different impression of the home resale market. Sales levels have hovered near 75% of pre-pandemic norms for three years now

"Home sales refuse to break out," said NAR Chief Economist Lawrence Yun. "Inventory is up, and home prices are showing further gains. The market is at an interesting point with rising supply and increasing demand."

Big Picture Takeaway

The housing market continues to tread water. Sales levels remain well below historic norms, and despite rising inventory, affordability remains a major headwind. That said, any meaningful drop in mortgage rates could unlock significant pent-up demand—something both NAR and market participants continue to monitor closely.
