Uneventful Resilience

MBS Recap Matthew Graham | 4:25 PM

Monday's theme for the bond market was one of moderate resilience--at least for the longer-end of the yield curve. Yields are lower across the board (less so for shorter-term notes like the 2yr) without any headline or data-based motivations. On days like this, motivation is assumed to come from technicals and trading taking place in other markets for other reasons. With earnings season in full swing, it's no surprise to see 9:30am and 4pm garner most of the days volume and volatility.

Lock / Float Considerations

- Bonds continue recovering from last week's CPI-related selling with Monday marking the 4th day in a row of modest-to-moderate gains. There's no special reason to expect this momentum will continue. Rather, it's more likely to level off ahead of next week's more active slate of big ticket econ data. One wild card for this week for better or worse: earnings season in stocks could spill over into bond market volatility.
