Bond Traders Quickly Revise Their Bullishness

MBS Recap | Matthew Graham | 5:06 PM

"Revision" is the word of the day as every armchair economist struggles to understand how the NFP revisions could be so big. Given that it's not 2020 or 2021, today's revisions were indeed on the large side (those years were MUCH larger... 2021's average NFP revisions was 159k). It speaks to a marked deterioration in the labor market or some limitation in BLS manpower/funding or methodology. Either way, markets traded it in a massive way. 2yr yields (more closely linked to Fed Funds Rate expectations) fell almost 30bps! Mortgage rates are back to mid October levels.

Lock / Float Considerations

- Days like Friday are why we always warn that NFP can cause a huge reaction in bonds. This one was great. Follow through precedent is variable, but the Mondays after these kinds of Fridays err slightly on the bullish side (though not enough for a risk-averse person to change their mind on locking). The lowest rates since mid October indeed present a compelling lock opportunity.
