Fairly Resilient Despite Bumpy Auction

MBS Recap | Matthew Graham | 4:18 PM

The relevant morning econ data was limited to Jobless Claims. While the weekly and continuing numbers were both higher than expected, it wasn't a big enough miss to spark any sort of decisive rally in bonds. MBS lost ground heading into the PM hours and lost some more ground after a poorly received 30yr bond auction. But whereas the auction could have been used as a front for additional selling, bonds generally did a decent job of holding their ground in the last few hours of the day. Friday's calendar is empty. This doesn't mean we won't see any volatility--simply that it could not be driven by scheduled events.

Lock / Float Considerations

- After last week's NFP-driven rally, bonds have been fairly flat this week. The absence of follow-through. It increasingly makes 4.20% look like a resistance level. The lowest rates in 10 months will always be a compelling lock opportunity for the risk-averse crowd. Risk-tolerant floaters have many overhead lock triggers to choose from between present levels and 4.40%. Thursday afternoon carries some specific angles to ensure that both can present levels and move for Thursday afternoon times some specific asymmetric risk for those floating with lenders who did NOT reprice for the worse on Thursday. If bonds hold perfectly steady overnight, those lenders will be looking at low enough MBS prices to result in slightly higher rates in Friday morning's rate sheets.
