Bonds Hold The Range Despite More Data-Driven Volatility

MBS Recap | Matthew Graham | 2:27 PM

At 0.9, not only did today's PPI crush the 0.2 forecast, but it's also the highest reading since post-covid hyper-inflation by a wide margin. And while there's always a chance it will be revised to something less alarming next month, it was enough to do noticeable damage to bonds today. Before the data, 10yr yields were knocking on the yield floor at 4.20%. This afternoon, they're up closer to 4.30%. Things could have been even worse if not for the fact that the PCE components in the PPI data suggested a much less onerous impact on the PCE data that will come out in 2 weeks. Nonetheless, it will be enough to keep eyebrows raised regarding the extent to which tariffs are hindering a return to the 2% inflation target (something that will unfortunately be up in the air for many months).

Lock / Float Considerations

- After a lower consequence day on Wednesday, risk/reward increase somewhat on Thursday and Friday with the return of econ data (PPI on Thursday and Retail Sales on Friday). Risk-tolerant clients still have plenty of room between here and the 4.40% technical level to set overhead lock triggers. Risk-averse clients still have the lowest rates in 10 months.
