Generally Exciting, But Specifically Boring

MBS Recap | Matthew Graham | 4:14 PM

Heading into the present week, it was incredibly unlikely that we'd see any exciting volatility in the bond market this week. At the very least, we knew that it was really only Friday's PCE data that carried any notable volatility potential. With 4 days down, the "boring" narrative has prevailed. Like every other day this week, Thursday saw mild movement and low volatility with very little connection between events and market movement. But as it happens, the mild movements have all been in the same direction this week, and they're starting to add up. To wit: 10yr yields just hit their lowest 3pm CME close since August 4th and the 2nd lowest since April. MBS are doing even better and mortgage rates reflect that.

Lock / Float Considerations

- With rates hitting 10-month lows three times this week, risk-averse clients are still in lock mode. Risk-tolerant clients have enjoyed a very narrow rate range in August, but they should be aware that odds are we'll be waiting until the early September jobs report before seeing any major rate momentum, for better or worse.

Technicals/Trends in 10yr (why 10yr)
