Limited Follow-Through After Shockingly Big Miss

MBS Recap | Matthew Graham | 4:53 PM

If you told the average trader that today's core CPI would come in at 2.6% vs 3.0% year over year, they would have expected a much bigger reaction than we saw today. Ironically, the size of the miss may be one of those reasons. It's so far outside the realm of expected possibilities that traders immediately assumed the presence of legitimate issues with November's data collection. Nonetheless, it was worth a moderate extension of the overnight rally.

The screenshot shows the MBS Live software interface. It features several windows: a 'TIME PRICING' window for MBS 30 Year yields, a 'REAL TIME CHART (MBS)' for 30YR FINRA 4.0, a 'REAL TIME CHART (TREASURY)' for 10 Year Treasury yields, a 'LIVE NEWS STREAM' with a play button overlay, and a 'LIVE CHAT' window. The 'REAL TIME CHART (TREASURY)' window has a green box highlighting the chart area. The 'LIVE CHAT' window shows a list of messages from users. The bottom of the screen has a 'MBS CALENDAR' for January 27th and a 'MBS LIVE ALERT' for 'More Pronounced Negative Airspace Risk as MBS M/Lows'.

Lock / Float Considerations

- Thursday's CPI data was so far below expectations that bonds hesitated to rally as aggressively as the numbers suggested. Nonetheless, this easily reinforces the ceiling of the recent range and arguably the last true low of 2025. A mix of economic data ticks and lower geopolitical risk will likely be the serves as the last true trading day of 2025. Apart from some potential random year-end volatility at the very end of the month, the next risk for consequential volatility from scheduled events won't be until the first week of January.
