Oil Impact Ultimately Shunned in Favor of Jobs Report Implications

MBS Recap | Matthew Graham | 4:38 PM

It was a super interesting day for the bond market. Yields rose to the week's highs overnight as oil prices continued to surge. We knew we'd get at least some sort of reaction to any big beat/miss in the jobs report and today's miss was certainly big. At first, the reaction was logical. Bond rallied. But the paradox set in quickly and yields hit new highs by 9:30am. Fed funds futures continued arguing for a bond rally, as did lowest S&P levels since November. One could say "bonds finally came to their senses," or "the initial selling was a quick bout of profit taking," but no explanation would have been obvious upfront. Since 9:30am marked the shift, we'd have to go with the vague "positional considerations" and stock market safe haven excuses. Either way, with bonds ending up flat despite oil cracking $90/bbl, it was good enough.
