Some Volatility Surrounding Headlines, But Not Much Change

MBS Recap | Matthew Graham | 2:29 PM

Bonds began the day roughly flat before losing ground modestly into the 9am hour as markets mis-read headlines regarding new peace proposals submitted by Iran. But just before 10am, similar headlines resurfaced including the claim that Iran's new proposal made concessions regarding Iran's nuclear aspirations. This accounted for a swift move into positive territory that was only partially reversed after Trump said he wasn't satisfied with the latest proposal despite acknowledging progress in the peace talks. The net effect is a bond market that is roughly unchanged heading into the 3pm CME close. As has been the case, any major progress toward peace over the weekend (or any major escalation) could result in trading levels being drastically different on Monday morning.

- 5/1/26 - Friday adds some evidence for a technical ceiling at recent high yields, but we have yet to see better confirmation of such a ceiling via a break below 4.37%. In fact, yields tried that briefly this morning, and quickly retreated. Still, it's a more supportive outlook (or at least more neutral) compared to Wednesday. There continues to be a decent opportunity for risk-takers betting on a peaceful resolution to the Iran war. The defensive view focuses on war costs and yet-to-be-felt inflation pressures keeping rates higher than the market expects.
