Bombarded by Headlines, But Little-Changed

Monday's trading session ended up being an exercise in headline-watching, as has been the case on so many days since the start of the Iran war. Today was more active than normal in that regard. The earliest headlines (as covered in the AM commentary) were helpful until they weren't. Subsequent headlines continued pushing back on the notion of an easy peace deal until 3pm. At that point, Trump posted that a planned military operation for tomorrow was cancelled and that serious negotiations were now taking place between great leaders and allies, and that a deal will be made. Bond yields and oil prices dropped on that one with Treasuries ultimately making it back to unchanged in the final hour of the session.

Lock / Float Considerations

- 5/18/26 -Some signs of resilience, but bonds didn't show any strong urge to buy the dip without justification in the news. It continues to be the case that a peaceful resolution to the Iran war will likely push rates lower, and the market seems like it will be receptive when the time comes, but it's also the case that the timeline is unknowable.
