Bonds Faded in the Afternoon Despite Oil Price Recovery

Oil prices and bond yields started the overnight session higher, but both moved to the lows of the day just after 9:30am. From then on, oil went broadly sideways while bonds sold off gradually. If oil had instead moved higher into the afternoon, we might not care about the bond market weakness. But as it stands, we have bond-specific defensiveness in the afternoon replacing the modicum of bond-specific bullishness we noted in the morning commentary. Not the end of the world, but not ideal.

Lock / Float Considerations

- 6/8/26 - Another leg higher for rates and another confirmation that it makes sense to remain defensive after a strong sell-off in response to a big beat in the jobs report. Upward momentum in rates waned a bit, but we're not taking much solace in that considering oil prices would have justified stronger closing levels in the bond market. We'd wait for better evidence of support before returning to a more neutral lock/float stance.
