Minimal Deal Drama, But Next Week Could be Different

MBS Recap | Matthew Graham | 3:33 PM

Various headlines out of Iran pushed back on the notion that a preliminary peace deal was near the finish line this morning. This resulted in modest upward pressure on yields for the first several hours of the day. Then just before 11am, Iran's foreign minister said the media shouldn't speculate and that the deal has "never been closer." Trump subsequently reposted that news. This sent oil prices back toward the day's lows and helped bonds recover most the ground lost earlier this morning. Volatility was minimal in the bigger picture. We'd expect a much bigger reaction to an official signing--something that could happen in a matter of days or continue to be punted indefinitely.

Lock / Float Considerations

- 6/12/26 - Plenty of event risk over the weekend as there's allegedly at least some potential of material progress on signing a preliminary peace deal. Were that to happen, rates would almost certainly fall--potentially somewhat sharply. Conversely, any major speedbumps would likely put upward pressure on rates. Fortunately, the market is familiar with those speedbumps and unlikely to read too much into them.
