Same Old Narrative Driving Additional Gains

MBS Recap Matthew Graham | 2:52 PM

(NOTE: this recap is coming out a bit earlier than normal. We'll publish an update/alert if there are any material changes in the bond market between now and the hard close in 2 hours).

Stocks slid overnight and bond yields followed. This is the prevailing correlation as bonds serve as a safer haven for the money bleeding out of the previously bloated AI trade. It's not always 1:1 and today, that worked in our favor as bonds didn't give back nearly as much of intraday move as stocks (i.e. stocks erased most of the their losses by 2:30pm, but bonds retained most of their gains). Such discrepancies could easily be explained by the excess, random volatility often associated with Thanksgiving trading considerations. We'll choose to be thankful that this is the way it played out this time around and we'll look forward to more liquid price discovery next week.

- 11/25/20 - Bonds continue doing as well or better than the prevailing stock market correlation would suggest (i.e. bonds benefited from weaker stocks overnight but didn't give back much of the gains when stocks bounced). For risk takers, this argues in favor of keeping options open, but keep in mind the heightened risk of random volatility surrounding the Thanksgiving holiday. Things could be completely different on Friday and especially Monday for no particular reason.
