Wild Ride on Jobs Day as Fed Speakers Steal The Show

Market Summary: Sunday, September 8, 2024 - 3:16AM

We came into jobs report day expecting some clarity on the size of the Fed's impending rate cut and in hindsight, it's abundantly clear that traders felt the same way. The only catch is that the lion's share of the clarity was reserved for a few short comments from Fed's Chris Waller. The market initially mistook those comments to suggest a 50bp cut, but swiftly reconsidered. In terms of Fed Funds Futures, the volume and volatility surrounding Waller's comments were FAR bigger than the action surrounding the jobs report earlier in the morning. Ultimately, it was a good enough day for rates with bonds holding modest gains.

Lenders Could Reprice in EITHER Direction

Here's one of those rare moments where markets have been volatile enough that the slower lenders could be moving one way while the jumpier lenders make the opposite move.

In the current case, we've seen a mini-flood of positive reprices thanks to the gains heading into the 11am hour. MBS are still up 6 ticks (.19) on the day and up nearly a quarter point from the lows seen just after 10am.

On the other hand, MBS are also down roughly a quarter point from the most recent highs. Lenders who repriced for the better just after those highs (around 11am) are already forced to consider pulling back. It's not necessarily likely for most of them, but it is a possibility.

10yr yields are up 1.2bps on the day at 3.717 after hitting intraday lows of 3.646.

Mortgage Rates Drop to Lowest Levels Since April 2023

have a long and storied history of making big moves on the day that the big monthly jobs report comes out. In that regard, today was fairly normal. Indeed, the jobs report came out and mortgage rates made their biggest move of the week, dropping to the lowest levels since April 2023.

The biggest catch in today's case was the fact that much of the market movement came in response to comments from several Fed officials who weighed in on the prospects for the rate cut in a week and a half. Granted, the jobs report influenced those comments, but they were ultimately reduced to votes for a 0.25% vs a 0.50% rate cut (the Fed is cutting either way).

To be fair, the Fed comments had a bigger impact on parts of the market that don't directly correlate with mortgage rates. That was a victory for us today. Rates would have been higher otherwise.

If this seems slightly confusing, it's important to remember that the Fed Funds Rate does not move hand in hand with mortgage rates. Mortgage rates move well in advance of the Fed because mortgage rates are tied to the real-time bond market whereas the Fed only updates rates 8 times per year. Moreover, the Fed Funds Rate applies to the shortest time frames (<24 hours) whereas the average mortgage lasts around 5 years.

The takeaway is that you should NOT expect mortgage rates to improve after the Fed cuts rates. Mortgage rates have ALREADY improved in anticipation of the rate cut.

Why You Might Regret Waiting For Better Rates After The Fed Cuts

This week's labor market data and Fed speeches solidified the case for the Fed to cut rates by at least 0.25% when it meets in 2 weeks. With more and more buzz surrounding that rate cut, it's only natural for consumers to enthusiastically wait for the lower mortgage rates that are sure to follow. All too often, those who wait are surprised to learn that the only rate that's guaranteed to mov...
