Weaker Afternoon, But Still Uneventful

Market Summary: Sunday, December 29, 2024 - 12:25PM

Bonds began the day in decent shape by pushing back against weakness during European hours. MBS were briefly in just-barely-positive territory in the first hour. Things deteriorated very slowly, but very steadily after that. It took the entire trading session for MBS to give up an eighth of a point. 10yr Treasuries had it worse, with yields moving back up near yesterday morning's highs. Chalk that up to ongoing "curve steepening" (fancy talk for 10yr yields rising faster than 2yr yields, and combine that notion with the fact that the average mortgage trades more like a 5yr Treasury these days). Modest volatility aside, volume and liquidity remained "holiday low." Next week brings different risks, mainly due to the chance that some big traders will be able to reposition bond portfolios after 2024 is officially over. These could go either way. The bigger volatility risk won't show up until the delayed jobs report on Jan 10th.

New Lows and Modest Reprice Risk

MBS are now down 2 ticks (.06) on the day and just barely an eighth of a point from the AM highs. Some later-pricing lenders released rates during those highs, so if they're feeling jumpy, they could technically justify a negative repricing.

That's not especially likely, but possible. With that in mind, if you weren't planning on locking today, there's no burning reason to do so. And if you were planning on locking, there's no reason to wait.

Mortgage Rates Little Changed Today, This Year, And Over The Past 2 Years didn't move much today, and markets have been very quiet due to the holiday week. So we'll take a quick moment for a retrospective.

In September 2022, 30yr fixed mortgage rates crested 7% for the first time in more than 2 decades. The following year saw rates move momentarily under 6% and over 8% before returning to 7% by December. Surely, that broadly sideways performance in 2023 meant that a corner had been turned.

Up until the past few months, 2024 indeed looked like a decisively more hopeful year. To be fair, it was still better than 2023, but ultimately, just as sideways in the end.

Broadly sideways, with summertime hope and a winter wake up call

Will we find ourselves in the same position at the end of 2025? That depends on the state of the economy and inflation. The latter is of critical importance. Until and unless inflation sustainably returns to 2% or lower, longer term rates will have a very hard time making significant progress. Even then, the U.S. will need to avoid and preferably reverse the post-pandemic trend of heavy issuance of Treasuries--something that keeps rates elevated regardless of inflation or the economy.

If there's a saving grace, it's that this 3 year time frame (2022-2024) now looks a lot like 1980-1982 in terms of the trajectory of rates, and that was the big turning point for the only comparable episode in modern economic history.

Let's Try Something New For 2025

"So long 2024. Don't let the door hit ya!" Or... "another year closer to turning a longer-term corner in the housing market." For better or worse, 2024 was a lot more like 2023 than most housing/mortgage pros were expecting. Existing home sales still have another month of reporting for 2024, but there's no result that would change the perception of this year being an almost perfect carbon copy ...
